AVALANCHE RISK

On each explanation is indicated the risk from which the path is closed

Risk 5

The snowpack is weakly stabilised on most (*) sufficiently steep slopes.

Numerous spontaneous large avalanches, and sometimes very large ones, can be expected, even in less steep terrain.

Risk 4

The snowpack is weakly stabilised on most(*) sufficiently steep slopes.

Avalanches are likely to be triggered even with low overload(**) on many sufficiently steep slopes(***)

In some situations, numerous spontaneous avalanche starts of medium and sometimes large size can be expected.

Risk 3

On many(*) sufficiently steep slopes, the snowpack is only moderately to weakly stabilised.

Avalanches may be triggered even with low overload(**) and on many slopes, especially on those generally described in the bulletin.

In some situations, a few spontaneous avalanche starts of medium size, and sometimes quite large, are possible.

Risk 2

On some(*) sufficiently steep slopes, the snowpack is only moderately stabilised. Elsewhere, it is well stabilised.

Avalanches may be triggered mainly by heavy overloading (**) and on some of the slopes generally described in the bulletin. Spontaneous avalanche starts of large magnitude are not to be expected.

Risk 1

The snowpack is well stabilised on most slopes.

Avalanches can only be triggered by heavy overloading(**) on very rare steep slopes(***)

Only flows or small avalanches can occur spontaneously.

(*) The characteristics of the slopes are specified in the bulletin: altitude, orientation, topography...

(**) Indicative overload :

high: grouped skiers, grooming machines, explosives... low: single skier, pedestrian...

(***) Slopes that are particularly prone to avalanches because of their steepness, terrain configuration, proximity to the ridge.

The term «triggering» refers to avalanches caused by overloading, in particular by the skier(s).

The term «spontaneous departure» refers to avalanches that occur without external action.
